Meet the parents who stepped up to support their neurodiverse children

When a child is diagnosed with a neurodivergent condition, families are often thrown into a world of uncertainty — marked by grief, questions, and the daunting task of figuring out what comes next. But some parents take that moment of upheaval and turn it into action. Pallavi Shankar profiles four such parents who didn't just adjust to their children's needs, they reimagined their careers and built spaces where neurodivergent children can learn, thrive and be understood

'We sold our home to build therapy centre'

Iftekhhar Abidi, entrepreneur and father to Insiya (16)

My journey, along with my wife, began when our elder daughter Insiya was diagnosed with autism and several associated medical conditions at a young age. Her care and development demanded constant attention, which led my wife and me, then working professionals in the financial sector, to make a big decision to quit our careers to fully support her needs. It was not a personal sacrifice; rather, it was the beginning of a larger vision.

As a father, I realised early on that my daughter would need a structured, safe and empowering environment to live with dignity even beyond our lifetime. This made me quit my job as VP of a company to step into the uncharted territory of entrepreneurship. I started a dates packing unit, followed by an autism centre, run by my wife, to build a pathway not only for Insiya but also other children with special needs. The journey has not been without hardship. To fund our efforts, we took tough decisions — including selling our family home and moving into a rented space. But the purpose was clear: to create a safe space for neurodiverse children.

His tips for parents: If you are a parent who wants to welcome children with special needs into your home for birthdays and other gatherings, do your homework to make the experience comfortable. Keep the environment calm and predictable. Avoid loud music or sudden changes. Allow neurodiverse child/children to engage at their own pace; don't force interaction or physical touch.

The Fortune Foundation for Special Needs began with just two children in a small room. It has now grown into a fully functional therapy centre for autism and other developmental challenges.
